J. K. Moore

J. K. Moore in 1863, a year before he left Washington D.C., and traveled west. J. K. Moore Collection, American Heritage Center.

During the late 1800s James K. Moore served as the post trader and Indian trader at Fort Washakie on the Wind River Reservation, located in the Territory of Wyoming.

Moore lived on the reservation for several decades during which he photographically documented life at the fort and the reservation. His son, J.K. Moore, Jr., continued photographing the area and people after his father's retirement to California in 1906. This exhibit displays a portion of the Moore's work as a pictorial window on the daily lives of people living at the fort and reservation during that period.

Size: 30 framed items (2 crates).

UNIVERSITY
OF WYOMING
American Heritage Center

The American Heritage Center (AHC) is the University of Wyoming's repository of manuscripts and special collections, rare books, and the university archives. Its collections focus on Wyoming and the Rocky Mountain West (including but not limited to politics, settlement, and western trails), environment and conservation, the mining and petroleum industries, air and rail transportation, the performing arts (particularly radio, television, film, and popular music), journalism, and US military history.

Students and scholars from around the globe use these collections for research. The AHC also sponsors a wide range of scholarly and popular programs including lectures, concerts, symposia, and exhibits. Housed in a landmark building shared with the University Art Museum, access to the AHC is free
