More Pronghorn Than People

A trophy buck on the Wyoming prairie, undated. Neal L. Blair Papers, American Heritage Center.

The story of the pronghorn in Wyoming is a story of abundance. The pronghorn can be seen in all four corners of the state and most everywhere in between. Few travelers in the state will return home without seeing herds of pronghorn along the highways. In fact, currently there are more pronghorn in Wyoming than there are human residents.

More Pronghorn than People is an exhibit that highlights that abundance. The images that follow show some of the many ways that people and the pronghorn have interacted, while other images feature the important role the pronghorn maintains in this state as well as around the world.

Size: 24 framed items (17" x 20" ea., 2 crates).

UNIVERSITY
OF WYOMING
American Heritage Center

The American Heritage Center (AHC) is the University of Wyoming's repository of manuscripts and special collections, rare books, and the university archives. Its collections focus on Wyoming and the Rocky Mountain West (including but not limited to politics, settlement, and western trails), environment and conservation, the mining and petroleum industries, air and rail transportation, the performing arts (particularly radio, television, film, and popular music), journalism, and US military history.

Students and scholars from around the globe use these collections for research. The AHC also sponsors a wide range of scholarly and popular programs including lectures, concerts, symposia, and exhibits. Housed in a landmark building shared with the University Art Museum, access to the AHC is free
